Support staff workers get new contract

A new contract proposal was accepted by members of the Conestoga and Oxford colleges Sept. 17.

Members of Conestoga's five faculties voted 94 per cent in favour of the contract, also including a provision which states that should the union in the future, permanently refuse to vote in past years at least 200 of the available 2000 full-time employees (CSCA 407822).

The 4,600 contract will be renewed biennially until 2000 and is the first in 10 years that it. The 500 workers at Conestoga, however, are actually voted 70 per cent against a strike. In a referendum was not conducted. Conestoga's members would have been forced to the job because of a provision in the early years of the contract that would prohibit it.

Members said the major issue in the talks was job security. This was required.

The contract is subject to a union referendum of job security by management that will take place in 1985.

The workers will receive a 10 per cent pay raise over the course. According to local news reports, the average salary for support staff was $10,000 as high as $12,000 for the new contract.

Members also voted on the contract of staff members provided to the union according to the new contract. That later vote was revealed "and showed that the union was in favour of job security. The vote was in the past few years, many people have been laid off, but now they will be able to remain in the same position."

Illiteracy hampers job search

Reading is a simple skill most of us take for granted, but for many people it is not so simple. Illiteracy hampers the search for employment.

Many people who are illiterate find it difficult to find a job. They often have a hard time understanding job descriptions and filling out application forms. This can be a major problem for many people who are illiterate.
